Module Three

Learning Objectives

By the end of this module, you will meet these learning objectives:

-  Explain how sustainable systems foster human equity
-  Explain how conflict resolution supports sustainability
-  Describe how environmental systems and human ideology impact behavior
-  Explain the role of cultural bias and human consumption in environmental use

Module Overview

Module Three addresses the first pillar of sustainability—social justice, which refers to the actions people take to ensure equity in a society. How does social justice relate to sustainability? Why is it important to foster human equity and to consider cultural diversity as we approach sustainability issues? In this module, we will explore answers to these questions and more.

What you will learn in Module Three:

- How sustainable systems foster human equity
- How conflict resolution supports sustainability
- How environmental systems and human ideology impact behavior
- The role of cultural bias and human consumption in environmental use
- The value of cultural diversity in approaching sustainability issues

Why you will learn it:

- Equity is an important component of the global community.
- Conflict is inevitable, and knowing how to resolve it is essential to supporting sustainability.
- Behavior can either help or harm sustainability.
- Humans' resource consumption and cultural biases affect sustainability.

- Cultural diversity contributes to the cultivation of sustainable systems, which foster human equity.

Tips for success:

- For this week's discussion, you will need look for an article or video from the Shapiro Library about a sustainability issue related to social justice or diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI). When you do this, remember to think globally by considering the perspectives of people and cultures all over the world.
- Review the Project Guidelines and Rubric before completing your Module Three short paper (Project Draft One).
